As a flight attendant, and a cell phone user, I think that use of cell phones in the air is a very bad idea. As it is, most passengers don't listen to our demos of safety equipment. We have a hard time getting them to turn phones off for departure --they'd prefer to talk, rather than pay attention to our instructions. The noise level would be deafening and people would feel it was their right to use their cell phones if the FCC gives its approval. We don't need to have to police the use of phones. If it is possible for terrorists to plan any additional threats using an aircraft, why provide them with the communication instrument to make it easier to follow through on their attempt? Common sense says, "people can wait to talk after landing"!!! Please consider all the negatives, along with any positive reasons to approve cell phone use aboard an inflight aircraft.
